

Our Relationship Universe After Losing a Spouse:

There is a big universe of people and you are at the center of it.

Your relationships have been greatly altered from the death of your spouse and orbits will adjust accordingly to fit their new positions in your life.

You have a very tight cluster of moons closely orbiting around you.

They are your very good friends and close family members.

They are the most important people in your life.

They care deeply about you and they will not leave you.

Beyond your moons are many planets that are near, far, and in-between.

You know them all, but they are too many to count or remember.

You will notice a lot of movement with these planets in the future because they will shift positions now that your spouse is gone.

Some will surprise you.

The planets closer in orbit are your most common friends.

You expect they will support you when you need them, but some will disappoint you.

They won't keep in contact.

They'll drift far out into orbit and become less available to you.

Some will drift away very quickly.

Don't take it personally.

Many common friends will drift away, not because they don't care or they're upset, but because your spouse was the primary bond. Now that your spouse is gone, that bond is also gone and they will drift away. You'll notice it when it happens.

Expect it.

It's natural, and it's okay.

Many planets have been orbiting you much further out, and some for a long time.

You know them, but you're not as familiar with them because you don't see or hear them as often as your more common friends.

Some of these planets will gravitate more closely to you in the future.

Some of them will occupy the space vacated by others, and some will become a part of your life in new ways.

Your life is different now, and they may fit into newly created space that previously didn't exist.

Lastly, you have distant stars surrounding you in all directions.

Those are people you haven't met.

They are future friendships and relationships you'll develop because your life path has changed due to your loss. You'll form new patterns in your life, and you'll cross their paths. Some of those distant stars will orbit very closely to you in the future and will become wonderful relationships.

Allow your planets to re-position themselves.

Do not resist their movements nor bother predicting their results.

There are too many of them to track and you'll likely guess incorrectly, anyway. Allow your close planets to drift afar if they choose and embrace the planets that gravitate closer to you.

Your new relationship universe may appear differently for you.

Allow it to become beautiful.